

General Hunter Liggett commands the first American army corps formed in France, and now fighting on the Marne.

Copyright, International Film.

Up there and ready for the Hun. A group of American veterans outside of a front line dugout on a sector held by our troops.

Copyright, International Film.

An American gun crew fighting in gas masks during a recent German attack. Here the men are shown loading the weapon.

Copyright, International Film.

Above—Gen. H. J. E. Gouraud (with beard) is the man who barred the German advance in the Champagne. He won fame at the Dardanelles.

Photo, Underwood & Underwood.

At Left— Gen Mangin is the hero of the Franco-American offensive between the Aisne and the Marne, where he commanded.

Photo, Underwood & Underwood.

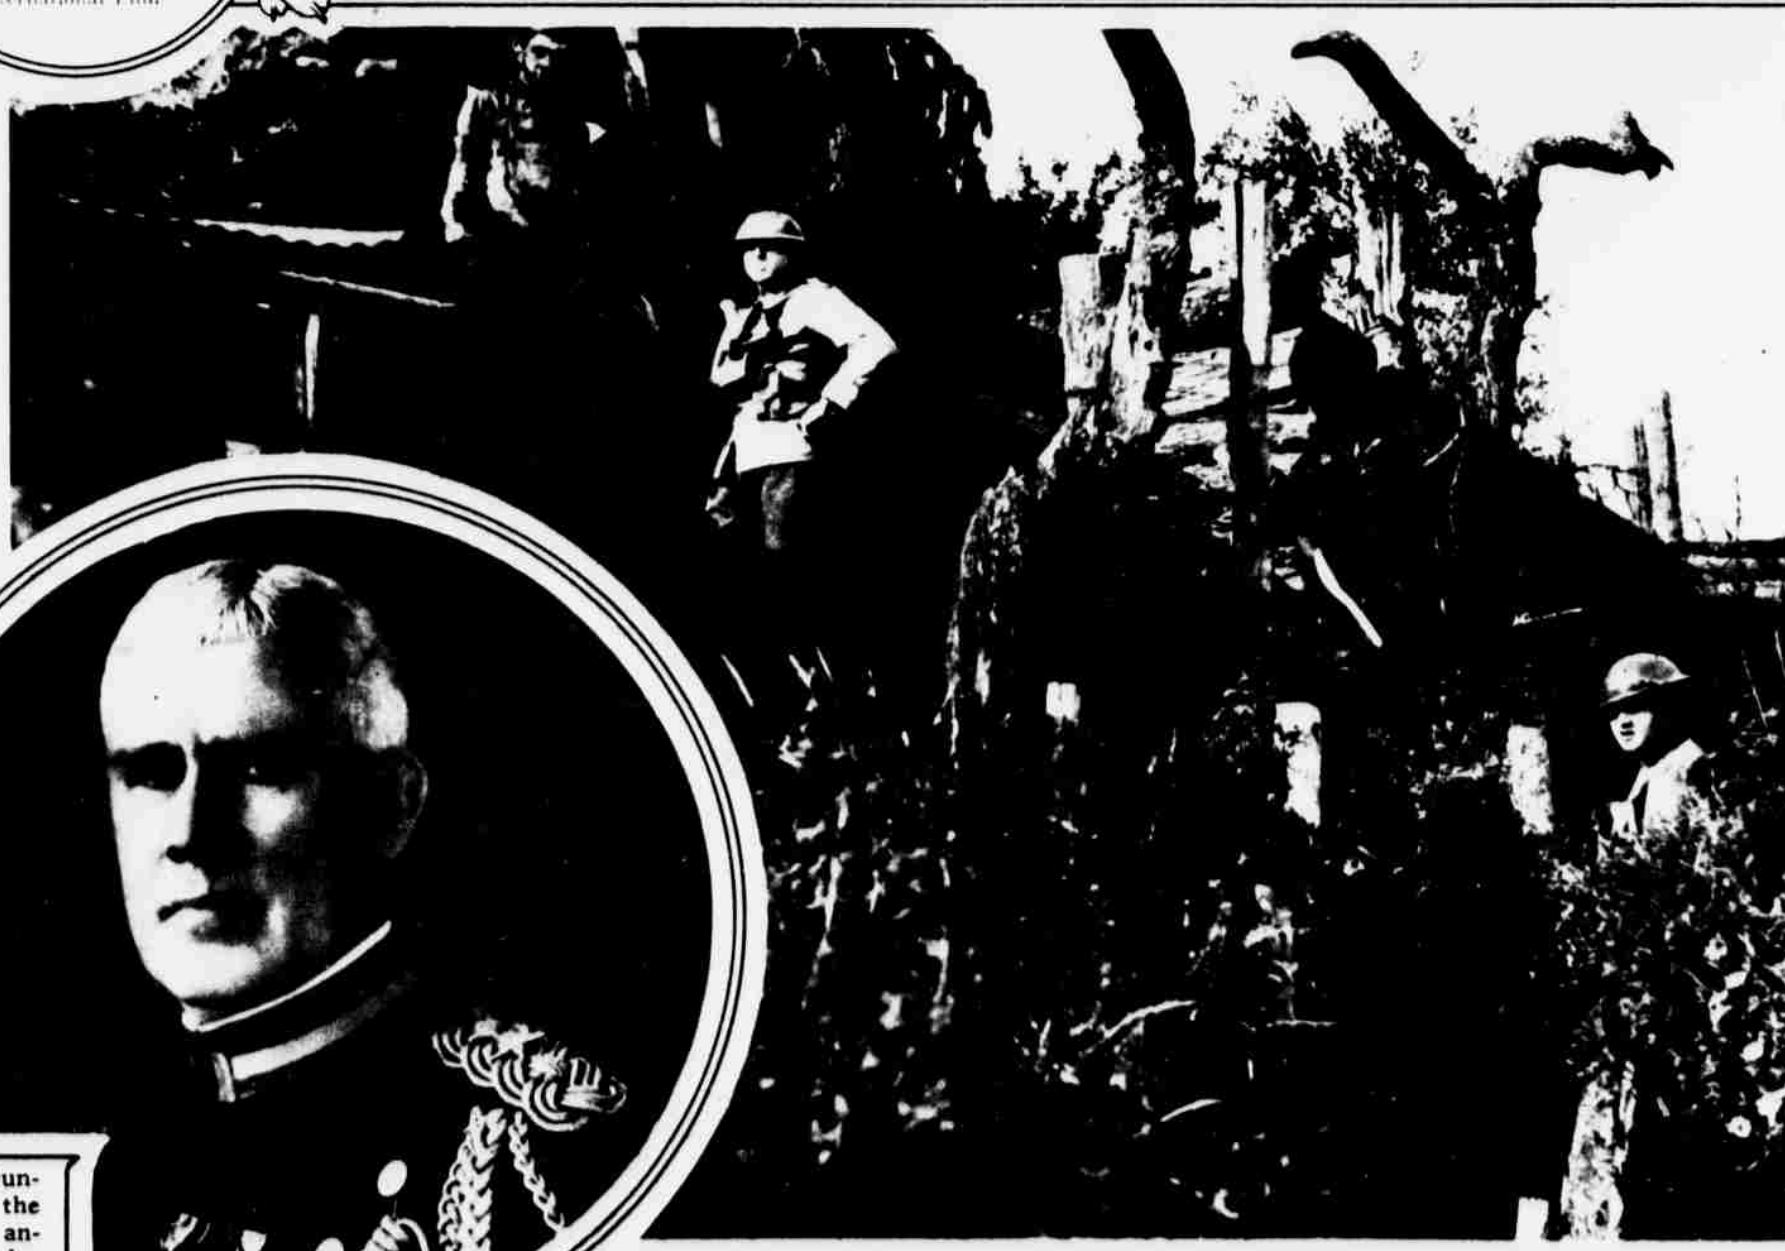

Gen. Omar Bundy (left) is the American credited with the declaration to the French commanders that his men would not understand being ordered to retire and that he proposed to counter attack.

Copyright, Committee on Public Information.

Gen. George B. Duncan, who wears the Croix de Guerre, is another American leader who has distinguished himself on the Marne.

Copyright, Harris & Ewing.

A section of the American trenches in the mountain district of France where the fighting so far has not been heavy. The photograph shows the details of trench construction, particularly in the use of supports.

Copyright, International Film.